INTRODUCTORY

I HAVE gladly accepted the pleasant task of preparing the present catalogue. The owner of this collection desires to withhold his name, unwisely, I think; but I can say of him that he has widely traveled in the classic East, gathering with enthusiasm every relic of the ancient world that caught his fancy, and aided by a knowledge of the languages spoken in Syria, was enabled to secure genuine antiquities, not, as generally, from the more or less dubious offerings of the bazaars, but from the peasants and local excavators themselves. In this way he has brought together a great mass of objects, especially glass vessels, which are the most noteworthy contribution to archaeology from this region. While it cannot be claimed that the collection is rich in those marvelous colors that sometimes, though rarely, have come to light in the Syrian tombs, still in the varied iridescence, and especially in the great number of forms, we have here a very wide choice for selection. The source of each object, when known, is given from the collector's own record. The glass vessels date from the fourth century before Christ to the Roman Empire. Few can be dated more exactly, as unfortunately the native excavators, themselves ignorant of archaeological data, keep no accurate record of objects found together in a given tomb. To the archaeologist this is deplorable, but unavoidable under the Turkish régime; and not of the greatest importance to the American collector of charming works of ancient art. It is unnecessary to add that the wonderful color of much of the ancient glass, which cannot be imitated to-day and hence is a proof unassailable of antiquity, is due wholly to the centuries of burial in the tomb. One can often, indeed, detect how the vase or bottle lay by the presence or absence of iridescence. Many of the specimens here offered show a rare play of colors that would grace any cabinet.

Besides the glass, we have here examples of all that comes from the Syrian tombs. I would note especially the intaglios in hard stone, mostly dating from the Roman period, and for the most part set in modern gold rings and scarfpins; the highly interesting Sassanian signets; and the objects of bronze, including several rare statuettes found in Italy. I have tried to describe every object with accuracy; all are perfect, unless otherwise noted, as they leave my hands, and all are genuine antiques, where I have not clearly expressed my doubts. Every piece was acquired abroad by the present owner; not one has appeared before at auction. Lovers of antiquity will do well to harvest their treasures now; in a few years such opportunities will be gone forever.

GEORGE N. OLCOTT.
